Economic situation and capital market in the reporting period/outlook

Increasingly mixed investment environment

In the year under review to the end of September 2018, the upswing in the global economy continued, but increasingly varied trends were observed at a regional level.

Furthermore, the economy in the USA remained strong – favoured by extensive tax benefits and incentives to reinvest income generated overseas in Germany. The growth in most European countries was also positive, albeit less pronounced. The high level of unemployment there fell only slowly. In Japan, the moderate upward trend continued on balance, even though the growth slowdown in China made the export prospects unclear. In the emerging markets, the emerging economies in Asia were still positive. This was offset by crisis developments in some other countries, such as Argentina, Turkey and Venezuela.

Accordingly, the central banks of developed countries reacted differently depending on the regional conditions. In the USA, the range for the key interest rates was increased in four stages, most recently from 2.0% to 2.25%. The British central bank also moderately increased interest rates to counter the build-up of further inflation potential resulting from the devaluation of the pound. In contrast, the European Central Bank and the Bank of Japan maintained their de facto zero interest rate policy in view of the weak economic momentum.

In particular, the rapidly rising oil prices led to an acceleration of general inflation, while core inflation rates (excl. energy prices) remained comparatively moderate. While there were also signs of an increase in the prices of some other commodities, the price of gold fell significantly despite geopolitical uncertainties.

Equities: Prices predominantly rose, but varied widely on a regional level

In view of more pronounced differentiation of economic development, there were significant differences on the stock exchanges of individual regions. In the USA, the strong upward trend in prices continued, which was mainly due to large-cap technology securities. Japan and Europe recorded significantly lower growth. In particular, equities from strongly export-oriented countries like Germany were put under pressure against the backdrop of the conflict with the USA over the level of import duties. In the emerging markets, the Eastern European equity markets and the Asia-Pacific region ended the year under review with noticeably positive results. However, the prices tended to stagnate in China and India, while in other countries, especially Turkey, the prices plummeted as a result of currency crises.

Volatility – the range of fluctuation in price developments on the equity market – increased significantly in the meantime due to concerns about the consequences of the trade dispute between the USA and Europe on the one hand and between the USA and China on the other. Later, the situation calmed down again, although investors remained nervous.

Interest-bearing investments: Differentiated events

The performance of international bond markets was equally mixed. In the United States, long-term treasury securities declined in value due to rising market yields. By contrast, prices of top-rated government bonds from the Eurozone tended to move sideways. However, the yield mark-ups of Italian securities increased due to uncertainty about the future fiscal policy of the new government. High-quality covered bonds and corporate securities remained largely stable. High-yield securities performed well, especially in the USA, where the risk premiums of “high yield” bonds fell when compared to government bonds. On average, interest-bearing securities from emerging markets yielded negative results. Here, concerns about the stability of individual countries led to general scepticism among international investors and corresponding capital outflows. Emerging-market bonds issued in local currencies suffered in particular as a result of this.

Outlook

The trade conflict between Washington, Beijing and Brussels is expected to continue to dominate the headlines with surprising changes. The economic effects of the protectionist measures are currently difficult to predict as the implementation of import duties will only pick up speed in the third quarter. In spite of the expected restrictive effects, global growth could remain above the potential rate for quite a while as strong US growth compensates for weaker data from Europe, Japan and parts of the emerging markets. A significant slowdown or even recession in the global economy are not currently in sight in our opinion, which should continue to favour high-opportunity investments such as equities.
